<Course Description and General Goals>
 The chief aims of this course are to gain an overview and understanding of the central messages and themes of the major and minor prophetic in their historical and canonical contexts, and to develop competence in reading and interpreting Old Testament prophetic literature through in-depth study of selected texts. In developing their reading competence, students will learn about the social, political, and religious cultures of the pre-exilic, exilic, and post-exilic periods; learn to identify sub-genres within prophetic literature; practice identifying and articulating key themes that occur throughout the prophetic books; consider the significance of biographical information about the prophets for interpreting their books; and examine relationships between certain prophetic books and other Old Testament books, as well as those between certain prophetic books and the New Testament. In addition, students will also compare and contrast traditional and modern approaches to selected books while reading and discussing secondary literature, and they will consider the significance of Jewish and Christian canonical arrangements for interpretation.
